No More the Lady of the House: Lady MacBeth's Downfall as a Result of Displacement from Her Role as Wife

Angelica Lemke
Denison University

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.denison.edu/articulate
Part of the English Language and Literature Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://digitalcommons.denison.edu/articulate/vol3/iss1/2

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by Denison Digital Commons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Articulāte by an authorized editor of Denison Digital Commons.
In his introduction to the Oxford Edition of Macbeth, Stanley Wells gives the usual praise for Shakespeare's character Lady Macbeth, saying that her "steely determination, her invoking of the powers of evil, and her eventual revelation in sleep of her repressed humanity...have given [her character] its long-proven power to fascinate readers and to challenge performers" (975). Lady Macbeth is often viewed as the driving force behind the actions of Macbeth, the half of the Macbeth couple who is able to reject "the milk of human kindness" and act solely from her own ambition. Is this so? In fact, Lady Macbeth seems unconcerned with her own desires; instead, she places all her energies into the desire of her husband to be king. It might rather be asserted that Lady Macbeth acts solely from her husband's ambition. Contrary to the traditional view that Lady Macbeth's demise is a result of her ability to "unsex" herself and abandon so-called "womanly" ideals of kindness and compassion, it is Lady Macbeth's adherence to the Renaissance ideal of a wife who exists only to serve her husband's needs that leads her into madness following Macbeth's rejection of her role in his new revenge-centered kingdom. Once Macbeth begins to act without consulting his wife, he has eliminated her ability to act for him and therefore her ability to act at all.

The Ideal Renaissance Wife

Lady Macbeth first speaks the words of her husband, reading his letter. Rather than entering the play as a woman with her own thoughts, ambitions and schemes, she is introduced as Macbeth's mouthpiece. In the soliloquy which follows Macbeth's letter, she speaks only in terms of what her husband wants and the obstacles which stand in the way: Glamis thou art, and Cawdor, and shalt be What thou art promised. Yet I do fear thy nature. It is too full o' the milk of human kindness To catch the nearest way. Thou wouldst be great, Art not without ambition...(I. v. 3-7).

Lady Macbeth goes on to plan how she will speed Macbeth to action, the chastisement she will serve to him for not acting on his desires, though she has revealed in the latter part of this speech that she does not endorse the murder. Irene Dash notes, "Tantalizing us with the contradiction, 'Wouldst not play false, / And yet wouldst not wrongly win,' [Lady Macbeth] reveals her own moral judgement with the word 'wrongly.' She then jettisons these values in favor of being the fully supportive wife" (160). Before Lady Macbeth has even begun her mighty charges to her husband, it is revealed that she is willing to deny her own morality to serve his purposes, to help him to the goal that he wishes to attain. Her often-cited "choice" to descend into evil methods seems to spring wholly from her desire to serve Macbeth, rather than desire for the kingdom. She asks that smoke surround her so that her "keen knife see not the wound it makes," that her conscience may remain ignorant to the acts she undertakes to serve a god who is higher than divinity in her world, her husband.

Macbeth's arrival allows Lady Macbeth to assume fully her role as wife. She greets him at the door, reassures him about the coming murders and sets the preparations for Duncan's visit in motion, with only two sentences from her husband's mouth. She has acted in precisely the way a Renaissance wife was expected to act. Among the requirements for proper wifely behavior, Lady Macbeth would find that her "behavior was carefully prescribed. She was to tend to her household duties industriously, so as not to waste her husband's goods" (Dunn 17). As the scene closes, she says, "Leave all the rest to me" (I. v. 71),

Angelica Lemke is a sophomore English (writing) and philosophy double major. She is assistant Arts and Entertainment editor for The Denisonian and assistant editor for Episteme, Denison's philosophy journal. Of this essay, she says, "I never liked Macbeth until I looked at it from this approach. Now, it's one of my favorite Shakespearean writings."
implying the crucial role she will have as hostess to the evening's meal.

"What cannot you and I perform?"

She greets Duncan, showing him much grace and honor, though her sentences are fraught with double-meanings, using the plural pronoun to refer to the household. She is not, as Duncan is, using the royal "we" in this situation, as is indicated by the fact that she is speaking to the king himself; rather, she is speaking as one half of a couple. This distinction becomes important in Act One, scene seven, when Macbeth shows his old habit of hesitation before the murders. Macbeth seems to be using plural in the royal sense as the scene opens:

But in these cases we still have judgment here, that we but teach bloody instructions, which, being taught, return to plague th' inventor. This even-handed justice Commends th' ingenuity of our poisonous chalice To our own lips (I. vii. 7-12).

His concern is with the punishment that he, as an individual, would receive if he committed the murder, the turning of fate against him.

Lady Macbeth, conversely, uses singular pronouns as the scene begins, but her statements are clearly about what she, as an individual, has on Duncan and his kingdom. Lady Macbeth stresses that she is, as he called her, his "partner of greatness," that they can "perform" anything on Duncan or otherwise, if they work as a couple. Her devotion to her marriage seems unquestionable.

As Macbeth stands hopelessly in shock, bloody dagger in hand, Lady Macbeth takes immediate action to preserve her husband. She returns the weapon to Duncan's chamber, smears blood on Duncan's attendants. Macbeth is trembling about the guilt which he feels, guilt which Lady Macbeth seems to share, saying, "These deeds must not be thought / After these ways; so, it will make us mad" (II. ii. 32-33), again using the plural pronoun, considering life from Macbeth's perspective of a couple, but Lady Macbeth is able to put these things aside for the larger purpose of preserving his safety, risking her own by going to the murder scene after the deed. Washing her hands as well as her husband's hands and instructing him to summon the servants in case Macbeth is unable to gather them.

Lady Macbeth's complete lack of influence on her husband is made finally apparent in Act Three, scene four, as Macbeth is confronted with Banquo's ghost. Though she speaks much to calm him and explain his bizarre actions to the court, Macbeth and his lords all but ignore her presence in the scene. No response is made to any of her excuses for his behavior, nor does he acknowledge the value of her work to cover his deeds. Macbeth ends the scene saying that he will consult the "weird sisters," the only other female characters to appear thus far in the play, about what action he should take next, rejecting Lady Macbeth as his accomplice entirely.

The Death of Wifeliness

Lady Macbeth's absences from Act Four of the play are conspicuous, especially given the introduction of another woman, the third and final significant female element in the play. Lady Macduff. The relationship between these two noble ladies, one of which is wife of the murderous king, the other who is wife of the man who will avenge that king's deeds, is such that their comparison is inevitable.

The women character who must win our sympathy and respect insist on reasoning for themselves. Lady Macduff belongs in this group. In a play where a woman's major concern has been to help her husband reach his goal, Lady Macduff questions her husband's value system, unwilling to accept his power of reasoning over her own...She perceives [Macduff's] flight as characterizing both fear and lack of reason when it endangers family, no matter what the ultimate goal may not excuse morally insupportable actions...Lady Macduff illustrates those qualities that highlight Lady Macbeth's deficiencies (Dah 192-193).

Lady Macduff, then, stands as a foil to Lady Macbeth in that she is a woman who, though helpless by her husband's departure, can think and act independently of her husband. She values the safety of her family, her entire family, above her husband's desires or even his personal safety. She represents the perspective of a woman, but she is not representative of something which Lady Macbeth could not become. Given that Lady Macbeth has been denied her role of submissive partner, an alternative role for her to assume might be that of a powerful woman willing to change his clothes when he is unable to do so.

Lady Macbeth's dialogue is indicated by the generic term "Wife." Here Shakespeare reveals how even the most independent of women is defined by her husband, and he also adds another dimension to her relationship to Lady Macbeth, making her not only subject to comparison, but allowing her to stand as a symbol for all wives. Lady Macduff's character is necessary because the both demonstrates the severity of Macbeth's descent into evil, being an innocent victim, and the death of wives, of women who are partners with their husbands, in the play. Lady Macbeth cannot take up this role because of her guilt in the murders, but she must have a clear contribution in her death, but her foil is able to die the death of wideliess in her place.
When Lady Macbeth makes her final appearance in the play, her concern for Lady Macduff reaches new levels. Where is she now? What will these hands ne'er be clean? No more o' that, my lord, no more o' that! You mar all with starting ship between these women: Macduff's is the ideal woman, and women are nameless creatures, no other speaking person in the play, her concern for Lady Macduff reaches submission and obedience to her husband. This is one way in which one might read the silencing, or death, of even the most autonomous women. This is one way in which one might read Lady Macduff's rejection of the "womanly defense" that she "has done no harm" (IV. ii. 79-80), that she is attacking her counterpart's lack of independent action.

Lady Macbeth's madness, her haunted nightmares, then, seems less a result of her role in the murders (She has, after all, continued to act without apparent mental anguish in all preceding scenes of the play) and more a result of her adherence to a doctrine of complete devotion to a husband, even to the point of personal sacrifice, both material and moral. She acts as the Renaissance would have wanted her to act, as Catherine Dunn states, "the law, too, had dictated that a woman's first commandment was submission and obedience to her husband. Furthermore, women were considered inferior...in power and position" (15). Having completely fulfilled this duty, she has brought about her own death.

It is no wonder that Lady Macbeth's death brings forth "the cry of women" (V. v. 8); she has died as a result of being the ideal woman, and women mourn her death as they would their own; these women are nameless creatures, no other speaking woman remaining alive in the play but Lady Macbeth's gentlewoman, and thus are able to represent all of womankind. Macbeth's mild reaction to her death, saying "She should've died hereafter" (V. v. 17), indicated how marginalized the female is in this society, as well as reveals that her death was inevitable in a world which binds a wife's fate to that of her husband. Lady Macduff offers an alternative to Lady Macbeth's behavior, but she dies as well because of the prevailing view of women. Lady Macduff, an innocent victim, inspires more sympathy than does Lady Macbeth, who had opportunity to sway her husband away from his misguided ambition and chose instead to support his desires rather than act on her own morality.

Lady Macduff's behavior, then, represents that which should be embraced, independent thought and action of a wife, rather than that which should be rejected wholeheartedly, Lady Macbeth's submission to her husband in all things. Had Lady Macbeth rejected this role as well, it seems the women of the play might have found some strength to avoid the tragic end in each other's independence; because she does not, the only independence they gain is through their deaths.

"Dearest partner of greatness"

Lady Macbeth, then, is done a disservice by the traditional reading of her character as, "the ravenous wolf[whose] hungry ambition for her husband to be king over-rides all other desires and responsibilities" (Pitt 65). Her character is not so simple as that. She is not the creature of ambition; Macbeth is the originator of the murder plot. He is the one who commits multiple murders to maintain his usurped position. She is merely acting as his ever-supportive wife.

It is this role which "over-rides all other desires," not personal desire for greatness.

Macbeth refers to his wife as his "dearest partner of greatness" (I. v. 10-11), but she is actually never his partner in the crimes. Rather, she acts only to move her husband to that which she knows he desires. Her only concern is with Macbeth's contentment. When he does not find contentment, she is rejected as part of that which cannot satisfy him. It is then that her lack of place in society becomes clear. She is essentially nothing in the eyes of the court and kingdom.

Her identification with Lady Macduff allows Lady Macbeth to be viewed as a multi-dimensional creature, a character who can both call up the powers of darkness to serve her husband as well as feel remorse for actions in which she had no direct role. Furthermore, the fact that she had no direct role in that murder and is still haunted by it leads one to see the relationship that all women in the society bear each other. The weeping of women at Lady Macbeth's death represents the weeping of all women who have not found a true partnership of greatness in their marriage.