Tapestry
By Saveria Steinkamp

I hung the skin of my beloved as a tapestry on my bedroom wall.

It covered the hole where the window used to be with striped and spotted embroidery woven from so many hollow explanations.

I run my hands through course prickles of hair, tangles of memories stretched taut,

and revel in the smell of earth and pine and blood until I feel breath beneath my palm and wet whispers tickle my cheek and run in droplets down my face.

I used to watch the birds through that window pecking at fine grains in the snow, sunken pores in alabaster skin, picking at perfection until it was ruined

A maddening, endless parody of our absurd pas de deux.

now I am lost in dead plastic eyes reflecting the cold grey glow of light through translucent patches where hair doesn’t grow and realize anyone could be watching through tinted glass

I picture framed expressions: Fierce, Wild embedded in the snow.
