My dad
takes his morning with juice and long, translucent sheets of Atlantic smoked salmon laid to rest like apricot stained glass flat against the sourdough and the radio too loud so that a monologue by Garrison Keillor takes up the room like hot syrup in a jewelry box drowning my mother in her sleep and staining the walls burgundy a shade she calls scab
and hated anyways