Eerily soon
I’d be old enough to give someone money to draw something on me and have it never wash off in the pool— And so, I thought about getting a scrabble piece, the lines of one, on my ankle on an afternoon in August after work at my first ever job, where I perspired doggedly and all over Dior garment bags and carried them like dead bodies up Hudson Street where the agents would only be wearing wide-legged pants, Postmate-ing arugula salads and savoring the garnishes until five,

which would happen to all of us in fifteen minutes.

And when it did and if we weren’t there for it, they’d all be too furious to ask about where specifically the Dior and I had been that had prevented us from being where we were supposed to,
but if they had asked,
I would have been honest in telling them that we were busy being assaulted during a power outage on the C train by someone’s selfish and untimely flatulence, and I would have told them about how even before the assault, I had already been thinking, foolishly,
that there was no way I could have wanted to be there any less.