One of these days I will remember what it felt like to be the child in my father’s car.
I will recall the rear-view glances and the mercy his eyes carried, benevolent light clouded by scars I struggled to understand.
I will remember, too, the temper he could not dispose of,
how I learned to be silent and look to passing landscapes.
There is now a hushed sputter of steam where the roaring fire in his voice used to be.
With each day I neglect to call him the task of picking up the phone seems at the same time more daunting and crucial.

I have drawn up the same home many times.
Only today does it become clearer in my imagination, gentle but
empty now.
